over the criticisms and found that though perhaps they did not exhibit so much research as the first one, still praise and blame were equally merited. Mr. Fraser-Smith, Bandmann, who had never done a distinguished trigonoid, and he had done him the justice to say so in his paper. No complaint was made of the criticisms, but at the same time Mr. Fraser-Smith had his own character as a critic to be maintained, and in case of a remark upon him going wide of the mark it would have been a case of One great reason why, with regard to public characters, public actors, the law allowed newspaper writers or public writers of any description to express fully their views was that it was beneficial as long as they were not expressed maliciously. If they found that it was false common to the biographer of the Time, then it would be privileged, although not, strictly speaking so. If it was not a fair and temperate criticism, and that the broken English and references to sour kraut and things of that sort, held Mr. Bandmann up to contempt, and Mr. Bandmann found it not proper, and Mr. Smith published a malicious libel. With regard to the second count,—It was a much more serious one; it charged Mr. Bandmann with conduct which if it was to be believed would place him in such a position that he would be ashamed of his friends, and make any decent female to shun him, and to get employment. The charges were grave and serious, and it was for them to say under what circumstances they were made. The evidence with regard to it was that Mr. Bandmann had, as he stated, withdrawn the usual privilege, and Mr. Fraser-Smith, who was in evidence that Mr. Bandmann had said in going to make him before the Magistrates for making use of these privileges after they had been withdrawn; and then Mr. Ogden told him that the "Tragic Force" article had been inserted in the Hongkong Telegraph by Mr. Fraser-Smith. Of course, what it remained, and he had said it had been followed him all over the world—Mr. Fraser-Smith was not responsible for that—and as he believed it referred to the case in which Mrs. Rousby was concerned it made him very nervous, and much so that he was almost unable to make his part. It was considered that it would have the effect on Mr. Bandmann he said it had—whether it would have affected any ordinary person in that manner. To have any article of that sort, even though it contained no allusions to Mrs. Rousby's case, following him about the world, was not pleasant to him, and he called out a trumpet-blower that was to say that one sounded his own praises and stating that one was a German Jew, referring to sour kraut, sausages and expressions of that sort; it was for them to say whether they were libellous or not. Well, Mr. Bandmann remembered that this article had been published, and that he was on the stage he sees a young Portuguese and he goes to the young man and asks him what he wants. This young man replies that he is a reporter of the Hongkong Telegraph, and Mr. Bandmann, remembering that he had been insulted by, and remembering that previous to this he had been taken this young man by the arm, leads him to the stairs and pushes him down,—the push was not sovere as the young man had admitted—and then Mr. Bandmann told him that he would serve him master the same way, or would serve him better, and then the young man was taken by the back of the head and Mr. Bandmann admitted that, from the state of his feelings and from the excitement he was in at the time, he gave the young man a moral kick and said that he was not going to serve his master, and his master was the bigger man, and he was not going to be so much as to be another witness. Mr. Fraser-Smith admitted that the young Portuguese had no business there, he admitted that he had told an untruth, and then Mr. Fraser-Smith spoke of what he called his "imagination" as the cause of the trouble, and was concerned in the case. Mr. Fraser-Smith made no complaint whatever. What he complained of was the message that was sent to him, and the remarks that were made about him. If his Lordship understood Mr. Fraser-Smith correctly, it appeared as though having published which he was not, and that he was justified in using the language he did towards Mr. Bandmann, in his newspaper, because Mr. Bandmann had first insulted him. Mr. Francis' contention was that defendant's contention was, finally, not the reason why he was not satisfied in the second count, but that he did it in retaliation, he was entirely taken away. His Lordship then said that there was no doubt that in certain cases there was justification, and certain communications had to be considered privileged. Mr. Fraser-Smith based his view of the law with regard to the publication on the ground that he was first a Bishop of Sodor and Man, which was a case in which it had been held that there was a rule with regard to privileged communications. His Lordship said it would be almost impossible in this life to go on if everything that was said or written—when spoken, libel did not consist in the words spoken, it would be libellous. His Lordship then quoted, as an instance, the case of a man who considered it his duty to inform his neighbour of what he knew of the character of any servant whom his neighbour intended to employ; and his Lordship said that such a communication, even though the information might not be given in every particular, so long as the statements made were made without express malice. A man was also justified in making a communication if it was made for the purpose of investigating a fact in which that person was interested. According to Mr. Fraser-Smith's view of the law, published in the investigation of a fact in which he was personally concerned, but his Lordship said that upon the evidence he could not concur with Mr. Fraser-Smith; there was no fact in the investigation of which he was personally concerned. In the case of the Bishop of Sodor and Man case it was held that a communication was privileged communication, one of those that came under the law laid down. His Lordship then traced the history of the case, mentioning that the words used by the Bishop towards Laughton were not of the character that was given to them by Mr. Fraser-Smith; and that Laughton was not a man of the character that Laughton had thrown false accusations against him, injuries to his ministerial influence, and made with an entire disregard to truth. It was held that it was privileged so far as it had been addressed to the clergy, but that it was not a privileged communication, but being a privileged communication, originally, and though not necessary for the actual defence, it was not required into too closely. To make that case applicable to Mr. Fraser-Smith's case Mr. Fraser-Smith had to show that his articles were privileged, com-

it is never so easy to get a verdict in a civil case as in a criminal case. His Lordship then said there being no privileged communication, the question to be put was whether the second article of the first comment upon Mr Bandmann's conduct as an actor, and whether it was for the public benefit that Mr Bandmann should be exposed, in case he was not a dishonest person, to the public for such a purpose. Mr Francis, the learned counsel, contended that it could not have been for the public benefit, and thereon he pointed out that Mr Francis-Smith could not point out in his plea how he was for the public benefit. He said that the public interest his Lordship thought that it would have been the fact that if Mr Bandmann had been guilty of conduct charged against him, guilty of seducing women and children in the Colonies and it had been known to Mr Francis-Smith, or anything that the knowledge of Mr Francis-Smith and he had then taken to publish a full and impartial account of what had taken place and it had been, strictly speaking, to certain circumstances in Mr Bandmann's past life as a reason for the argument he intended to put then before the public. Mr Francis-Smith contended that the public benefit had been done for the benefit of the public that Mr Bandmann's conduct should be exposed. The public was a large body by the word public was to be implied Hongkong alone but the public of the whole world. He said that the public interest groups were taken from various parts of the world, in his present terms were the United States, Australia, Calcutta, America and other places. If Mr Francis-Smith had been able to show some public reason for doing so and had sufficient facts on which to ground his charges; that he had then published a full and complete account of what had been published in these places, then it would have been open for the public to consider Mr Bandmann's professional conduct and say whether it was for the benefit of the public that such conduct should be published and made universally known in order that no other public man should be tempted to do as Mr Bandmann's conduct to prevent them from being treated the way that had been alleged. Such investigation would require strict proof, however, and it would not be sufficient for Mr Francis-Smith to say that he honestly believed that they were true and therefore the public interest might be proved. His Lordship then referred to the case of Dr Symon, who he said was now a dignitary in the church of Rome, and a man universally respected—that Dr Newman had only able to prove one of fourteen fifteen charges that he had brought against a man, as the public interest might be proved. Dr Newman had committed out of England. Dr Newman had then stated, that Mr Francis-Smith had stated, that it was very hard upon him as most of his charges could not be proved. But Mr Newman had to prove his charges. He had made these statements, and it was held, and very properly, that the public interest that where a man makes statements affecting the character of another, he should be in a position to prove them at the time. A person who libelled another, who published defamatory matter about another, was bound to prove the whole of what he had published. In libel cases was left to the judge to say whether the effect that came would have on the one before them would be if any one of the charges made by Mr Francis-Smith was true. Generally, it would have to find him guilty. Mr Francis-Smith came to the court, and he was not in a position to communicate, and it was not a matter that he, as a public writer, had any right to comment upon, or if he had any comment upon it in a fair or proper manner, or further if they found from his evidence, that there was malice in what he said, they would find him guilty of libel. He told the jury that they would have to consider whether these articles were published for the public benefit, or in retaliation and in a spirit of revenge. He said the prosecution asked them why if it had been for the public benefit, why these articles had been published. He said the articles had been published after his arrival and why they had been published was such a woman beaten as he alleged, the fact had not been published until after Mr Francis-Smith had quarrelled with Mr Bandmann. They had also asked further stated, that the articles had been published in the Hongkong Press, and the prosecution asked why, if it was in Mr Francis-Smith's possession before, it was published before Mr Bandmann's arrival; why Mr Francis-Smith had waited until he was asked to publish them. His Lordship told them that no man could take the law in his own hands. Even though he had been injured, he could not take the law into his own hands, and so far as he could understand Mr Francis-Smith's defence, his feelings having been hurt he had done that which he thought himself fully justified in doing, but His Lordship was bound to say that there was no justification for it in law and it was extremely prejudicial to the public interest. He said that he had provided remedies for all persons; if Mr Francis-Smith had been damaged he had his remedy; the law, however, gave no remedy for calling a man a scoundrel or the greatest scoundrel in Hongkong. The law gave no redress for that, except that it enabled any party to go before the Magistrate, and sue for damages. He said that the party to be considered to keep the peace. If Mr Francis-Smith was injured in his business in any way, he had his remedy in the Civil Court, and it seemed to His Lordship, from the evidence that it did not go to that extent. Mr Francis-Smith had said a great deal about being injured, but he had not proved that. He said that Mr Francis-Smith thought he had not permitted to give evidence he had still had the opportunity of making his statements, and it was quite open to the jury to consider whether the evidence brought against him was perfectly sufficient or not. As Mr Francis had pointed out, the fact that Mr Francis-Smith had been libelled was not a ground for his condemnation as it would have been in a civil case. His Lordship said that he considered the best remedy in law was to bring a civil action, but there were exceptions which the law had provided in order that certain cases might be prevented from being brought before a jury. He said that the Attorney General had considered the provision on that point. He considered the provision on that point. He considered the circumstances of the case; it was provided that no man was placed upon a criminal charge until he had received the Attorney General's sanction; a case was not placed before the jury until it had gone through the forms of the law. They were to be left to the jury to decide whether they could give a true verdict according to the evidence. He next dealt with the charges in the article. He thought that the kicking of the Portuguese young man had been proved to be a cowardly act. Disparaging himself in another of those cowardly acts. Had it been proved that then that Mr Bandmann was not a coward to the world as a contemptible man.
